My aim in this paper is to draw Plotinus and Derrida together in a comparison of their respective appropriations of the famous "receptacle" passage in Plato's Timaeus. He applies his skill and industry with great alacrity to improve his own subject: his affection to it grows with the time of his possession; and he puts a much greater value upon it, than upon any subject of the same kind that belongs to. They are circular think: disc shaped and they spin. Epic in scope, ambitious and readable, the Foundation Trilogy deservedly won the Hugo Award for the best ever series, the only time that award was ever presented.
